Factors of culture destruction of international communication in modern polyethnic space of Russian society

One of the negative effects that resulted in the collapse of the USSR should be considered as destruction of a positive culture of interethnic communication, as evidenced by the increase in aggression, hostility, cruelty, indifference, anger, alienation and cultural relations between the peoples of modern Russia, and its development in conflict embodiment, which can be regarded as anti-culture of interethnic communication, civilization threatening the country's security. Certainly, public order measures are urgently needed to address the risks associated with the growth of extremist nationalist forces and religious nature, but society certainly is tired of crises, conflicts, contradictions and disappointments that should join forces with the same purpose as negative taking place today in Russia, mostly of Russian origin, and thus to deal with it should be internal resources, its own multinational Russian people, which has in its arsenal, the historical experience of the high culture of interethnic communication allowing together, "shoulder to shoulder" to resist fascism and then build a "bright communist future", which in its present largely favorably differed from modern democratic present in international relations and cultural interactions.

Key words: international communication, international communication culture, tolerance, ethnic family, civilization safety.
