

PEDAGOGY

Nikolay I. Fokin

(Southern federal university. Rostov-on-Don, Russian Federation)

Professional lifelong learning as an educational strategy for the Russian Federation's national security

The article examines the relationship of education and national security. Modern trends of globalization contributing to the world become more holistic and interdependent due to the objective of integration processes. Under the influence of globalization processes, the problem of interdependence between the effectiveness of the national education system and the state of security in the country has become increasingly important. Today, countries face the task of providing a competitive advantage in the international arena. From this viewpoint, the key role is of the state education system and its potential. State security is provided by the totality of the available forces, assets and resources. However, a number of them occupy special place in human resources. The role of education in the national security is presupposed by the fact that sustainable development and maintenance of intellectual opportunities, economic and industrial potential of the state at a high level, which is required to implement a reliable meet the needs of peacetime and wartime directly determined by the state of the educational environment.

Key words: vocational training, continuing education, national security, national security education strategy.

April, 14, 2017
