Socio-philosophical analysis of identity and social space

It is stated that many phenomena and processes characteristic of the social development of the individual and society undergo different levels of change. The adaptation of society and the person in it to the new environment takes place quite quickly and actively affects the deep components in their structure. One of these basic properties of both society and personality is identity. In science this phenomenon is considered from different points of view: in sociology, identity refers to the relationship of a person with the social group to which he belongs or wants to be a member; in psychology, identity is seen as a set of personality properties and qualities formed during its development under the influence of a particular social group. The concept of social space is also ambiguous. Modern social space in various scientific approaches is interpreted as a complex and multi-component system with its own principles and laws.

Key words: personality, society, scientific knowledge, ethnos, socialization, social institutions.
