Transgression as a universal human ability

The article examines transgression as a universal property of human nature and culture, conditioned by its evolution. Semantic, value contours, causes and forms of transgression are considered taking into account the distinction between freedom and necessity, natural and social, definite and boundless, which is basic for philosophical anthropology. The article reveals the internal contradictions of culturally and historically conditioned transgression, which not only reveals the specifics of the manifestation of free will, but also the limited, relative nature of the norms and boundaries themselves that develop in the life of an individual and society. It is shown that these contradictions in the modern world lead to a mismatch of moral and legal ways of influencing transgression, in the gap of which the hidden motives or interests of individual subjects or groups of influence are often revealed.

Key words: free will, necessity, crime, transgression, morality, law, border, modernity, postmodernity.
