Transformation of the concept of combating terrorism in US foreign policy at the beginning of the 21st century

The article considers the transformation of the concept of combating terrorism in US foreign policy. Its evolution and development at the beginning of the 21st century are traced. The peculiarities of the approach of the George W. Bush administration to solving the problem of terrorism of rogue states and their influence on the US foreign policy are noted. It is concluded that the transformation of the concept of combating terrorism, which defines democratic processes in the country, has led to stagnation and reputational costs of the US policy.
