The concept of the Russian state-civilization as the basis of a new modernization stage in the modern history

The concept of the Russian state-civilization as the basis of a new modernization stage of modern history is presented and substantiated from the standpoint of philosophical socio-political analysis.

The modern specifics of international relations are revealed, the content of the concepts “national state” and “civilizational state” is revealed, the problems of Russia's national and civilizational identity, the features of Russian elitism, the dialectic of individualism and collectivism, general and frequent, state and market regulation, isolationism and integration, modernism and conservatism, traditions and innovations are actualized. etc. in the current context of globalization and glocalization. It is shown that the Eurasian Russian identity remains an incompletely developed practically oriented concept in the context of the need to ensure cultural, civilizational, ideological and ideological continuity of Russian modernization projects.

Key words: modernization models of development, “national state” and “civilizational state”, civilizational specifics of Russia, globalization, glocalization, new multipolar order of the polycivilizational world.
